Renaissance Numérique & the hate speech defusing project

Renaissance Numérique

Renaissance Numérique was born in 2007 from a strong conviction shared by its founders, that there is a need to anticipate the digital transformation of society to ensure that it does not induce new fractures.

Nearly ten years later, the think tank continues its mission of supporting public action in its digital transition and its goal of an inclusive, fair and growth-oriented digital society.

It currently has nearly fifty members (universities, major tech companies, entrepreneurs, representatives of civil society) bringing to life thoughts on digital matters all over the country. Henri Isaac, Associate professor at Paris-Dauphine University, is the Pesident of the think tank.
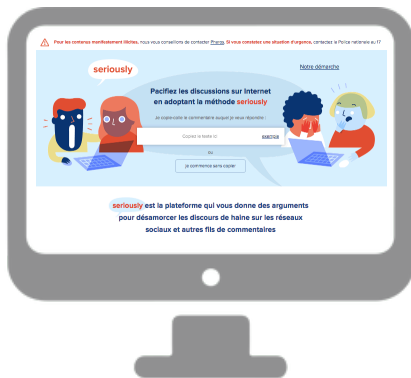

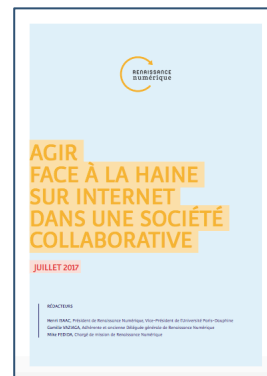

Defusing online hate speeches

Launched in 2015 after the January terrorist attacks, the Seriously project aims at participating in seeking solutions to restrain the hate dynamic that prospers in our society, and is particularly visible on the Internet.

THE SERIOUSLY PROJET

A tool and a method at the service of the society

A contribution to the reflections on the topic

A Partner ecosystem

Co-organizing Team

Context & goals of the event

Context of the event

Law and reporting tools are not sufficient to solve the whole phenomenon of online hate

The response made by the society has to be necessarily collective and the organisation of the mechanisms, collaborative and coordinated

All of the civil society and citizens need to be equipped with methods and tools to take action

The innovative initiatives from the civil society are abundant

Goals of the event

1. Promoting and sharing best practices, propositions, innovative projects and operational solutions across the world.

2. Building and activating an international network made up of engaged representatives of the civil society to take action collectivly.

3. Calling out the society for proposing coordinated approaches and for embodying a stronger involvement
